Announcement: MIEPP Research Module/Seminar
“Distributional Effects of Globalization”
Winter Semester 2022/23

Distributional effects of globalization are a crucial concern in the public debate. The question how globalization affects the distribution of income within countries is also a classical question in academia dating back to the famous work by Stolper and Samuelson (1941). In the last few years we saw a growing literature that focuses on distributional effects of globalization in models with firm and / or worker heterogeneity thereby providing a richer picture of inequality.

The goal of this seminar is to gain a better understanding of this important topic by identifying

- the channels through which globalization affects inequality
- the strategies how to quantify the distributional effects of globalization
- the differences between the distributional effects of trade and offshoring
- the possibilities to redistribute gains from trade

Students participating in this seminar should have a solid background in international trade. They should be interested in both theoretical and empirical work, and be familiar with the respective concepts and methods.

In the seminar participants will get to know recent academic papers, derive key equations and interpret empirical results. Participants will write a term paper and give a presentation. Presentations are scheduled to take place on January 19, 2023 (afternoon) and January 20, 2023 (whole day). The presentations are planned to take place in person on campus.

A mandatory (!) first meeting will take place on November 10, 2022 at 2.15-3.45 p.m. virtually using MS Teams. The specific topics on which participants will work will be announced in this meeting.

The seminar will be taught by Dr. Miriam Kohl (miriam.kohl@uni-mainz.de).
